Veolia to support “Education Above All” project in Kenya with innovative latrines and hand-washing facilities for schools and communities

A holistic approach to empower refugees through learning

The world is seeing unprecedented numbers of refugees and displaced populations due to conflict, disease and natural disasters. As part of its ongoing effort to address barriers to education worldwide, Education Above All (EAA) jointly with UNHCR will pilot a project that seeks to address the range of factors that currently prevent refugee camp residents from receiving an education—such as health and nutrition, livelihood, food security, water and sanitation and energy—effecting changes that will positively impact both the refugee and host community.

Since a joint visit to Kakuma Refugee Camp in Kenya in 2012 with Her Highness Sheikhha Moza bint Nasser of Qatar and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, EAA has partnered with UNHCR to develop a new holistic model that will empower refugee communities.

The aim of the Kakuma Project is to create an innovative programme that changes the way education is provided in humanitarian contexts. Rather than being entrenched in dependency, we are seeking to empower refugees and enable them to build a new life - both in the camp and in the communities where they will resettle.

The lessons and good practices that will result from this collaborative programme will serve to inform how refugees are supported globally.

EAA, which is funding the project, will coordinate the efforts of a wide range of industry partners, including experts in construction, project management, solar technology, sports, and water and sanitation, to create a multi-sector ecosystem conducive to the provision and sustainability of quality education.

Leonardo Pinheiro, Director of Strategy, Policy and Research for EAA, said: “The Kakuma Project represents an innovative approach to providing education in a conflict-affected community. Not a relief effort, the Kakuma Project focuses on improving camp infrastructure and providing educational opportunities to residents of all ages in order to give them the confidence, skills and knowledge necessary for self-reliance. Together with our partners, EAA seeks to give the residents of the Kakuma Refugee Camp the tools and agency they need to create a better future for themselves.”

The project, which is centered on the concept of lifelong learning, will offer educational interventions— from early childhood education to vocational training and literacy classes—that are designed to meet the learning needs of each individual regardless of age, background or special need. The project will also feature peace education programmes, sports and extra-curricular activities to benefit both refugees and Kenyan nationals in the surrounding community, further solidifying peaceful coexistence and enhancing protection in the region.

Within the Kakuma model project, Veolia, through the Veolia Foundation, will construct innovative latrines and hand washing facilities in primary and secondary schools and community centers – as well as water storage facilities to provide safe drinking water.

Veolia to support “Education Above All” project in Kenya

Doha – November 5, 2014

“Veolia has not hesitated to reply positively to the call for collaboration made by EAA to accelerate access to education,” said Patrice Fonlladosa, Executive Vice President, Veolia Middle East and Africa. Fonlladosa reaffirmed the importance of building long-term multi-stakeholder partnerships to succeed in this type of humanitarian and educational project.

The gathering of children in schools increases the risk of the accelerated spread of hygiene and sanitation related diseases. As such, addressing water and sanitation is a key issue in enabling learning interventions. The Veolia Foundation, a constant advocate of education especially in developing countries, will also work alongside EAA to educate children and communities surrounding the camp towards sanitation and hygiene.

Xavier Joseph, CEO, Veolia Gulf Countries, Veolia said: “We are extremely pleased to take part in such a prestigious and positive initiative that reflects Veolia’s commitment to building awareness and finding solutions for environmental challenges, and goes in line with our goal to empower, encourage and support tomorrow’s leaders.”
